

Building Block #12

As we have learned in previous blocks, a decrease works two stitches together resulting in one new stitch. The method used to decrease determines whether the resulting stitch leans to the right or to the left. This slant is especially important in garment shaping. The shaping of necks, armholes, sleeves and more are given a professional appearance when the slant of the decrease stitch follows the angle of the piece.

A Central Double Decrease (CDD) works three stitches together resulting in one new stitch that lies vertically with no lean. This stitch is often used at the base of v-neck openings.

In lace knitting, decreases are used to create many decorative possibilities. The pattern used here creates a lovely fern lace design that uses left, right, and center decreases.

Special Abbreviation

CDD (Central Double Decrease) Slip 2 stitches together knit wise (as if working a k2tog), k1, pass 2 slipped stitches together over knit stitch and off the needle.
